

FCC - Well, often times things are said to be "too good to be true" I guess the Do Not Call List is now another example. Dinner time in my home has once again become a private, personal time for me to spend time hearing about my family's day, not to be spent answering unsolicited phone calls from pushy, rude telemarketers. The one thing that is actually working 100% you now wish to take away from us. I truly do not understand your motives. SPAM and Porn is successfully being removed from all our Inbox's, but you want to protect the Telemarketers - the SPAM of yesterday. How about this - it is a real easy concept...if people want to buy something, they will call the people and organizations that are selling that good or service. Do not allow it to be rammed down our throats. We actually have a good thing going here - don't screw it up. Maybe if people had access to the home phone#'s of all the FCC members people could call them every night while they are trying to enjoy some quality, uninterrupted time with their families. Don't blow this one - leave the law as is. Maybe it will help your image and people will not dislike the FCC so much.
